

GENERAL TRUST GROUP REVIEW: AUTOMATED TRADING VS. MANUAL TRADING

Posted on May 29, 2023 by Herbert Bushbeard

Opportunities to invest and profit in the global financial markets are many. The trading environment has changed due to technological developments, leading to the introduction of automated trading systems. General Trust Group is one company that provides such a system, which relies on algorithms and computer programs to make transactions on the investor's behalf.

Still, many investors prefer the tried-and-true practice of manual trading, in which they judge based on research and expertise. In this post, we'll compare and contrast two trading strategies—automated trading with General Trust Group and manual trading—to help you decide which is correct.

General Trust Group's Computerized Trading System

Like many others, General Trust Group's automated trading system uses complex algorithms and rapid processing to place trades. These programs run according to the trader-defined rules and parameters.

Automated Trading

Reducing Emotional Prejudice

Trading algorithms remove the human element from the process by following a set of predetermined rules. Manual traders' decision-making might be negatively impacted by human emotions like fear and greed. Automated trading makes all deals with the utmost precision based on data and logic.

Effectiveness and Rapidity

Compared to human traders, automated trading systems can execute deals at the speed of light. They can quickly assess the market, locate good possibilities, and place transactions. This time savings may be significant in dynamic marketplaces when it is too slow means losing out on profitable chances.

History Reconstruction and Optimisation

Traders may use automated trading systems to back-test their methods using previous data. This allows investors to see how their strategies have fared over time, pinpoint their strengths and shortcomings, and fine-tune them as needed. Strong backtesting and optimisation tools are available on the automated trading platform offered by General Trust Group.

Diversification

When it comes to trading instruments and marketplaces, automated systems can manage them all with ease. This enables investors to spread their money over various assets, lowering their portfolio risk. Stocks, currencies, commodities, and cryptocurrencies are just a few markets available via the platform.

Handmade Markets

Trading manually entails making trade calls based on one's unique combination of analysis, intuition, and experience. Investors manually execute trades after attentively monitoring market circumstances and analyzing charts and indicators. Consider the pros and cons of traditional trading by hand:

Manual Trading

Capacity for Change and Modification

Traders who do everything manually have the flexibility to respond swiftly to shifting market circumstances. They can quickly adjust their plans in light of emerging data and events. As a result, human traders may take advantage of chances that computers would miss.

Analysis at the Base Level

Fundamental analysis, which manual traders may use, entails considering factors such as the company's or asset's financial standing, recent news, and relevant occurrences. Traders may use this method to supplement technical indications with other data and make more well-rounded conclusions. Long-term investments may benefit significantly from the use of fundamental analysis.

Individual Management

With manual trading, investors may make all the decisions about their investments. From entrance and departure places to position size, they have complete discretion. Such discretionary authority may be a massive boon to traders who like working with their hands.

Conclusion

Each trader has unique needs, objectives, and trading styles, therefore, the decision between automatic and manual trading must be made on a case-by-case basis. Confident investors may discover that using automated methods for specific techniques while manually trading others gives them the most outstanding results. Before settling on a strategy that fits your trading goals, taking stock of your abilities, limitations, and available resources is essential. The financial markets are constantly changing, so whether you like the ease of automatic trading with General Trust Group or the human touch of manual trading, you must be willing to learn and adapt on the fly to be successful.
